

EVALUATING FOODSERVICE OPPORTUNITIES WITH COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES 2022

The start of the coronavirus meant the swift end of self-service in college and university dining halls across the country. Prior to the pandemic, students were able to select a multitude of varieties and customized choices. For example, the University of Nebraska's salad bar dropped from more than 100 combinations to 25. Navigating that abrupt shift has been a challenge—but it's also brought about fresh insights and some welcome change. While fewer choices may seem like a negative across the board, students and operators alike have experienced a lift in enjoyment by interacting face-to-face as staffers now plate and assemble food. With the unpredictability of 2021, Foodservice IP is undertaking a comprehensive study of this segment so that manufacturers have the most up-to-date intelligence in order to plan accordingly over the next 6-18 months.

TOP ENGAGEMENT OBJECTIVES

1. Bring to light foodservice growth trends and drivers in U.S. colleges and universities after Covid-19
2. Deliver dynamics and trends related to different service areas/systems
3. Identify critical issues faced by C/U institutions and how these impact foodservice
4. Forecast how the C/U foodservice market will evolve through 2024
5. Reveal key growth opportunities and critical success factors for manufacturers as C/U operates in a post-Covid-19 world

FSIP'S APPROACH

- 1 In-depth secondary research scan to reveal trends and directions for the current C/U foodservice segment.
- 2 College student interviews to assess behaviors, attitudes and desired changes in C/U foodservice.
- 3 College and university operator contextual interviews that include 75 in-person audits and telephone discussions. The results will deliver qualitative and colorful insights into the current C/U foodservice service systems during Covid-19.
- 4 Strategic custom analysis with confidential recommendations for each sponsor on how to best leverage the C/U opportunity along with an informative Q&A webinar.
